5) Software License and Copyright There are two important code files distributed on the CD that is shipped with this product. One of these is the C Language source file (main.c), and the other is a library file (dalf.lib). These files may be compiled and linked respectively to create a custom application. The files are not required to support the built-in functionality of the product, but are provided to encourage development of custom applications on the Dalf Board. The licensing for the two files is different:

main.c - EE grants the purchaser of this product a license that allows the use of the main.c source code with few restrictions. The main.c file or a derivation may be used by the purchaser for essentially any use, including development of commercial applications. If the main.c file is changed (a derivation) to create such an application, the only requirement is that the EE Copyright line in the file header must be replaced with the following line for the purposes of attribution and to clarify that the file is a derivation and not the original source:

dalf.lib - All files comprising the “dalf.lib” library file are proprietary, are subject to United States and international copyright restrictions in favor of EE, and remain the sole and exclusive property of EE. An authorized purchaser of this product is granted a limited license which is restricted to the right to link the dalf.lib file to create a custom application that will run exclusively on this product. The dalf.lib file may not be used to create an application to run off board. The content of the dalf.lib file may not be re-engineered, modified, copied, or reproduced in any way.

EE assumes no liability whatsoever for the use of main.c (or derivation) or dalf.lib, when they are used to create a custom application. Nor does EE assume any liability for the functionality of any such custom application.
